It calculates number of days in a year, but the formula returns 366 for February. What's happening is that february year is starting in 01-01 and its ending in 31-01. I know that this can be done using #MONTHNAMES[1] method. Is it possible to find the number of days in a month without using formula?

Solutions that I am currently considering Count #monthnames[1]>2 Count #monthnames[] / Count #monthnames[0] Count #monthnames[] > Count

#monthnames[0] Can this be made efficient? A: One approach is to count the days from 1/1 of the month to 31/1 of the next. The code below is written in VB.NET, but the logic is the same in C#. For February, using enumerate(months) instead of a hard coded array of month names is more efficient because it only requires one lookup. Public Function

Voluntary participation in the campaign was wide-spread. Regional and national economic development organizations reached out to small businesses and provided them with pre-written letters and other materials needed to participate in the campaign. Food and beverage industry trade associations partnered with the TIA for a series of national webinars to provide farmers, distributors, and retailers with relevant and high-quality information about Green Dot. The campaign developed a list of service providers who offered to provide annual assistance to farmers and industry participants to implement Green Dot programs. nubaitwi 3aeca679079 Weighing the pros and cons of each.
