A simple strategy for improving image quality and assessment speed in breast cancer screening. This study aims to determine if breast lesion assessment can be improved by providing patients with written information about their lesion. Eligible subjects were women undergoing mammography as part of a screening program. The impact of written materials that described benign and malignant findings was compared with those describing only benign findings. Of the 128 patients, 105 (82%) completed the study, 46 of whom had a mammographically detected abnormality and 59 had no abnormality. The mean
