What we've managed to determine so far is that once in awhile (probably once a month or so) a user will encounter a 500 error when trying to visit a certain page. If you go to you'll see the page we're referring to. We've set our web front-end zone to not cache pages by using this in the 'root'/Pages' zone: We've tried setting this in the httpRuntime tag: Unfortunately that doesn't fix it either. We've also checked the 'time-to-live' setting for the IIS setting, and it seems to be set to the maximum value, which is 15 minutes. I'm at a loss at this point. Hopefully somebody's heard of something similar or has some ideas? A: So just in case anyone's wondering, we added a 0cc13bf012

The following options are available: - Windows (for x86 operating systems only).PARIS (Reuters) - French prosecutors are investigating the business activities of the web-hosting company 1&1 Internet SE E1V.DE, the broadcaster France Télévisions reported on Sunday, in a case that could put the company's Berlin subsidiary at risk of having to shut down. In light of a preliminary inquiry, the office of Paris prosecutor has requested that a judge opening a file against 1&1 Internet annul two temporary decrees that had forced the company to re-route traffic to France to block access to websites. The French Network of Internet Service Providers said on Saturday that the move should be “an alarm for us all” and that it would consider it necessary to cut the 1&1 Internet connection in its sites to prevent anyone from continuing their host migration. France Télévisions, which provides radio and television channels including Canal+ (TOYO NIKAN, BHD.ST), could not be reached for comment on Sunday. “This is the first time we have seen such a step,” Paris-based lawyer Nadia Baulieu told Reuters. “It is the result of a preliminary investigation, according to the request for annulment, and it is therefore likely to go further.” Baulieu said she was not aware of similar moves against two other French-based Internet service providers, the mobile phone operator Free and the financial corporation Orange. “We don’t know if it will ultimately be put in place but the prosecutor is requiring that the two decrees be annulled,” she added. France Telecom, the state-owned telecoms provider, and Orange are the major private Internet service providers in France. It was not clear if the company could have other legal actions pending against it. An initial inquiry is simply a step on the judicial process, Baulieu said. The French Network of Internet Service Providers said in a statement that it considered "it particularly concerning" that the 1&1 Internet management to be investigated for hosting sites with "harmful content." The group said it planned to make a formal complaint to the government and
