[Comparative biophysics of the interaction of anti-HIV-1 drug with human immunodeficiency virus-1]. Many efforts have been made in order to provide a new antiviral drug as a part of highly active antiretroviral therapy (HAART). Unfortunately, the development of this medicine has proved to be difficult, owing to resistance of HIV-1 to the drugs, and toxic side effects. To promote the development of new antiviral therapies, the search for new drugs has been guided by approaches that included the investigation of biophysical parameters that characterized the interaction between the target macromolecules (HIV-1 or its protein-ligands) and the active substance. The study included the assessment of antiviral activity of simeprevir (an acylguanidinium derivative that exhibits an inhibitory activity on HIV-1 replication) and the investigation of parameters that regulate the interaction of this substance with HIV-1 structural proteins. The study results demonstrated a high selectivity of the drug for HIV-1 protein and its nucleocapsid. Simeprevir showed promise in preclinical trials and was ready for clinical trials. The results obtained may provide a basis for the development of new drugs designed to decrease the HIV-1 latency and the therapeutic efficacy of existing antiviral drugs.
